

Article Title: Student report cards

Author: Editor Contributed

Offering your students a monthly (or quarterly) report card can be a useful learning tool as well as having benefits for parental interaction and free advertising.

For younger students offering a report on how they are doing is a very good method for offering encouragement. Adding a few sentences in a comment box as well will go a long way to keeping the enthusiasm levels up.

For the instructor it's a good way to record improvements and if needed a good way to keep track of corrections made.

Parents will be pleased to see a professional report about their child. This should not be something hastily written and passed out. Take time to prepare each one if you are going to use this idea. Showing that you care and are concerned is of utmost importance to parents; keeping them satisfied with their child's activities is very important for student retention.

Also be having an attractive report card for students, you are virtually guaranteed free advertising as this is something students will want to show off to their friends, take to school and use for 'show & tell', etc.

As a learning tool, student's report cards are highly effective to record regular individual data, demonstrate club organization to the parents as well as having no-cost advertising benefits. Download samples here:

http://www.uechi-ryu-journal.com/sample\_documents.php